The Bella Sera event raised more than $40,000 to support programs at National Jewish Health, the Denver-based hospital known worldwide for the treatment and research of respiratory, cardiac and immune disorders. Since 1998, U.S. News & World Report has ranked National Jewish Health the number one respiratory hospital in the nation.

Since 1972, fundraising events in Dallas have brought Texans together to support National Jewish Health. The annual “Bella Sera” reception began in 2010 with honorees Ike and Candy Brown. In 2011, Harry Bock and the Bock family were honored at the reception.

In the past three years, Texans have accounted for more than 1,100 patient visits at National Jewish Health, and have received nearly $135,000 in charity care provided by the hospital. Events like Bella Sera enable the institution to continue its legacy of never turning away patients, regardless of their ability to pay. In addition to directly caring for Texas patients, National Jewish Health has trained 63 physicians who now practice medicine in Texas and provided educational information and training for many others.
